

By: Tomorrow's Affairs Staff

Trump goes into an overdose of victim narrative under the weight of indictment

There is not much of a choice for Donald Trump regarding how he will pursue re-election.

After the fourth indictment against him, the one in Georgia, the Trump campaign definitely got its hardware and software.

Courtrooms will be his main campaign ground, and the narrative will centre on a tale of a victim and a sacrifice. But that is not entirely Trump's decision. The circumstances under which he will have to play have been forced upon him.

This combination appears to be helping Trump succeed so far. He continues to have a significant advantage among aspirants for the Republican presidential nomination (54% support) and numerous supporters on his side in the court cases initiated thus far.

According to a July survey, before the fourth indictment in Georgia, as many as 71% of Republican voters said that Trump had not committed serious federal crimes and that Republicans should stand by him (New York Times/Siena College).

Reasons for Trump's nervousness

But the indictment in Fulton County, Georgia, provoked more anger from Trump than the previous three cases before New York, Washington DC and Miami courts.

Anger was a common reaction until now, but not nervousness. It is visible now when the indictments have already piled up and, as his biggest problem, have heavily burdened his pre-election calendar. But also, the budget.

Trump has repeatedly stressed the link between the indictments and the election campaign during the first interview following Fulton County district attorney Fanny Willis's indictment - furiously and nervously.

"This politically-inspired indictment, which could have been brought close to three years ago, was tailored for placement right smack in the middle of my political campaign, where I am leading all Republicans", he told Fox News last Monday.

He accused the prosecutor, Willis, of being allowed to "interrupt perhaps the most important election in the history of our country".

Perhaps with the opening of one or even two cases before the Republican party primaries, Trump could optimally handle the campaign, moving from the courtroom to evening rallies or to recording video messages, which he would distribute through social media.

However, four large cases at the same time will require him to sacrifice some of that. Appearing in the courtroom is definitely not on the list of activities that he will be able to eliminate from his daily itinerary.

"Facing a felony indictment is an all-consuming experience for most people. It drains their resources, their money and their time. Donald Trump is facing four of them", Renato Mariotti, a former federal prosecutor told The Wall Street Journal.

The role of the victim used to be profitable

Even though prospects are still looking good for now (for Trump), as the courtroom campaigns not yet in full swing, Trump has software” regarding not changed the “vigor and bold justice but surprised with the way that presents software” a campaign, possibly the beginning of future defeat.

Getting votes on the story of the victim and The victim is extremely his voters. American politics. Trump is only a faithful follower of such an ending, mediated for” means its source.

you”;

I am being arrested for you” - Trump ” However, saying he is in danger means playing a victim narrative, which he has already used to win once, beyond measure, thereby making his message already having low profitability amount of potentially harmful as a citizen with

Jesus because they are constructed in accordance with the biblical narrative:

This is not his choice but a circumstance in which he is forced to sacrifice himself for your’s indictments with a total of 91 counts.

Will the conservative and religious electorate Trump accept 2016 election for as their political leader with the respect of God? Or will being victimized as a group that left them without work, unfulfilled plans as a heavy s fault, the perception that they someone else’ were governed by someone who does not In 2016 and 2020. They presented himself as the powerful, strong, and wealthy of the US who knows how to deal with bullies.

Trump positioned himself as their protector, He previously saying that he knew they of his supporters would have to be blame for a their problems that he first capable of dealing with those forces?

This messianism was about 2016 effort of victims that applied by political actions against the high front that is illegal (was hard on pressing oneself as justice), the of social oppression (from the positioning of someone systemically) and self defined (Miles R. Anderson, Whither Whynot? 34 years. Victimhood in American Politics, 2021/22).

Messiah syndrome

We will easily find examples for each of these perceptions of victimhood in political life, but it is difficult to find all three used simultaneously, which Trump is currently applying.

Under the pressure of felony indictments, Donald Trump enters into overdose when using the victimhood and sacrifice narrative. His competitors for the Republican Party nomination have already recognised this and want to knock the only remaining propaganda trump card out of his hands in time.

s waltzing into a wedding around Washington, “

D. Clinton is that he ‘

us. For us! How lucky are we! That we have such a selfless, magnanimous leader”, said Chris Christie, the former governor of New Jersey and one of Trump’s fiercest critics.